

MARCH 22, 2012, AT GEORGE MASON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW

Judicial Engagement

and the Role of Judges in Enforcing the Constitution

What: George Mason Law Review & Institute for Justice's Symposium on Judicial Engagement & the Role of Judges in Enforcing the Constitution

The courts were meant to play an integral role in keeping legislators and executive branch officials within the proper bounds of their authority, but judges today are often unwilling or feel unable to enforce constitutional limits on government power. The Institute for Justice and the George Mason Law Review invite you to a symposium that seeks to move beyond the imprecise and unhelpful rhetoric of so-called judicial activism and simply ask whether judges are properly engaged in their role of interpreting and applying the constitution. Admission is FREE!!!

When: Thursday, March 22, 2012, 8:15am – 3:45 pm

Where: Founders Hall Auditorium, George Mason University School of Law

Please register (no charge) by Thursday, March 15th, 2012 to gmysymposium@gmail.com and indicate whether you will be attending lunch.

If you have questions concerning the symposium, please email Katie Brown, Symposium Editor, at gmysymposium@gmail.com.